APPRECIATION

As we come to the end of our first year in Norway, we wish to express to our host of patrons and friends, our sincere appreciation for their generous support during the past twelve months. But even more than this material expression of your acceptance of this institution as a part of the community, do we value the friendships and good will that we have gained.

Every employee of this store, from clerk to manager, has but one purpose—to serve you faithfully and well. We want you to feel that this is YOUR STORE, and we cannot, in any measure, succeed unless you have received full value and a little more, for every dollar you spend here. Thus we can go forward, happy in the knowledge that we are performing a really worthwhile service to the community.

Beating The Boss

By C. F. Whitman

Chapter II

THE BOSS GETS AN IMPORTANT SETBACK

Harry Brandon arrived at Comiston Falls one Saturday afternoon and having gone to one of the hotels near the station, engaged a room and leaving his traveling bag and topcoat, he went at once to call on Barbara. He found her in tears, but overjoyed to see him. He took her to his heart, saying: "Are you glad to see me, Barbara?" To this she managed to reply between her sobs: "Of course I am, Harry, but you have waited so long and I thought you would never come and had forgotten me."

Harry: "Forgotten you! How could I? Why these tears and is it too late?"

Barbara: "I don't know, but sit down and I will tell you. Thenupon she told him how Baxter, having lost her mother money in her distress, with the ultimate purpose of getting her (Barbara) for his wife, but finding her unwilling to have anything to do with him, had threatened to come and take possession of her home under the mortgage given him by her father and at that very afternoon at four o'clock. And she had asked Bertha (Cushing) to call upon him before he was with her when he came on his unbecoming errand, and she had consented to do so. Harry inquired how much was due Baxter on the mortgage and how much money which he had lent her mother, but he had said that she could pay up, he would take the amount due on the mortgage, "and call it square" to use his own words. After she had told him how persistent Baxter's wooings were and how often repeated refusals, Harry claimed: "Don't cry or worry any more, Barbara. I'm here now, not only to save you from further annoyance, but have ample means in my pocket to pay the old reprobate every cent that is due him."

Barbara was so overcome with joy that she put her arms about his neck and kissed him, saying: "God bless you, Harry! Heaven must have sent you for you have come just in the nick of time. But I leave Bertha's conduct to the doctor, as the doctor's operation on her broken leg was not successful and she is still lame." With her was George Little, the high school teacher and Harry's friend. Bertha was one of the instructors under him, and having called on her on some matter connected with her school, finding she had an engagement with Barbara, proposed accompanying her, which she accepted.

The meeting was a joyous one for all, and after the greetings were over it was decided that all but Barbara should retire to another room with its door slightly ajar to hear what Baxter said when he came leaving her to meet him at first alone, till Harry should appear to deal with him. Promptly at the hour, the Boss appeared and with him were Caleb Gray, the lawyer, and Billy Tiff-staff, the officer. Baxter was surprised that he didn't find Barbara in tears, but she was greatly relieved up as might be expected.

Baxter at once opened up on the matter that had brought him there and said: "Miss Barbara, I have come on a most disagreeable errand, but something had to be done sometime. My claim now is for my pay forever. My claim now is worth more than the property I will bring, but on account of the regard I had for your father and mother, I've let the interest run. The whole now amounts to fifty-five hundred dollars, but as I told you, if you can square up the matter I'll take five thousand dollars and Caleb Gray is here to make a discharge of the mortgage and receipt for the money I owe your mother and if you are not prepared to do that, as I apprehend is the case, Billy is here to formally take possession of the premises for me, so that the foreclosure can be recorded. You need not go out at once if you will do so when I get ready to fix up the place. But perhaps you may change your mind, if you haven't already."

Barbara: "No, Mr. Baxter, I haven't and shall never do that. I've been here here interested by Harry. They were bursting in upon the astonished trio followed by Little and Bertha, fairly shouting: "Mr. Baxter and gentlemen, it's my turn now to take a hand in these proceedings. I've been in the mortgage which are legal tender, to pay Mr. Cummings' mortgage and Mrs. Cummings' indebtedness. So, Mr. Gray, you look over the papers, cast the interest, determine how much is due and make a discharge of the mortgage and what other papers are necessary and I'll let Barbara have the cash to pay every cent Mr. Baxter's due. You see I've got the money."

Barbara: "You see I've got the money, taking a large roll of bills from the breast pocket of his coat. The Boss fairly gasped in his astonishment and chagrin, but managed to say: "You've struck it rich and come back."

"Yes, it seems so, just in time, Mr. Baxter. Only reached here the matter of two hours ago." Baxter nodded to the officer, who had said that he didn't appear to be needed and told him that he might go, the turning to Little and Bertha, who were attentively listening to what was going on, he angrily shouted: "So you are staking your noses into this affair, are you? Well, I'll see that you are well paid for it by losing your jobs, for others who know enough to mind their own affairs and not interfere with the private matters of other people."

Barbara: "They are callers here, sir and are my guests, and they have a right to be treated decently by you or anybody else, Mr. Baxter." Little and Bertha arose from their seats with a word and retired into the room they had left and closed the door.

It took Gray the greater part of an hour to determine the amount due. Barbara had found several receipts in Baxter's handwriting for money which her father had paid him on the mortgage, which it was ascertained had not been endorsed on the mortgage notes. Baxter expressed great surprise at this and declared that he couldn't account for the omission. These payments had to be allowed, of course, and when Gray finally completed his figuring he found that there was due Baxter the sum of four thousand, five hundred and twenty-five dollars and seventy-five cents.

Harry: "You will take off the five hundred dollars, I suppose, that you offered Barbara if she could 'square the account,' Mr. Baxter."

Baxter, angry: "Not on your life, young man, I propose now to have what is due me."

Harry: "That's exactly what I thought, Mr. Baxter. You must have changed greatly if you are disposed to give anything to anybody without getting full returns and more. Count out the money, Mr. Gray." He did so, then passing the amount due Baxter over to him, that personage signed the papers made for him and as they left the house Baxter said: "You will hear from me again, young man for this," and Harry retorted: "I shall not be surprised, for I expected when I came East to have a contest with you, and now have won the first round."
